

Dress Code

Albert raced to the restaurant for the most important date of his life. It was the fanciest restaurant in the city, and he would find Tisha there. After a glass of wine, he would propose. But when he arrived, he found that the restaurant had a dress code -- tie required. Albert -- tieless -- needed to find one, fast. Across the street were two kiosks. One was manned by a neat haberdasher, slightly bald on top, with a bushy black mustache. The other was manned (so to speak) by a monster dressed in weird body parts. Albert chose the haberdasher.

"Quick, I need a tie!"

"All I have left are my line of animal-based ties, all tan... Could I interest you in one of those?"

"That won't work! The restaurant rules say that the tie must be made of cotton. I'll take anything else!"

"I'd like to help you, sir, but my tans are hide."

Albert turned to the monster. His kiosk displayed berets made from hollowed out livers and belts that looked like extended intestines. There was a row of arms, fingers down, hanging from the top of the kiosk.

"I need a tie! " Albert demanded. "It's got to be cotton!"

The monster slowly lifted his gaze to Albert. "I'd like to help you, sir," he growled. "But my ties are hands."

