

By Bread Alone

Matilda had worked at the Brown Bread Bakery since she was in her teens. It wasn't what she had hoped for. She loved baking bread, but here she was baking the same old bread day after day for the same old people. Without anyone knowing, she baked her own creations on the side and wrote to Britain's Got Bakers trying to get on the show. They responded only after she sent them a loaf of her specialty, bread with swirls of butter dough. They wanted to speak with her, and she gave them the address of the bakery. Now she was waiting for them to arrive. So far, there were just the usual customers asking for the usual bread, but in walked two confused people clearly out of place, one with a briefcase. Matilda smiled and said to herself: Theirs is not two wheats and rye, theirs is butter dough and I.

