

The Meaning of Coffee

If you looked down a certain row in a certain supermarket, you might notice midway down on the third shelf a can of Folgers, a can of Maxwell House, and a can of Nescafé. They sat on that shelf for days, weeks – who knows how long? They certainly didn't.

“Why are we here?” asked MH.

“Perhaps we're meant just to stand fast until the Final Roasting,” offered F.

And so it went, day after day.

Until a person in a uniform appeared and affixed a sticky label to Folgers. Then he left.

“What was that about?” demanded MH.

“Why you and not us?” continued N.

MH peered at the note. “S-O-L-D... what does that mean? What is it for?”

“Why did it appear?” trembled N.

But Folgers accepted the significance of the label, whatever it may be, and remained silent. The truth would be revealed in due time, perhaps even tomorrow. Sold Folgers never why, they simply wait a day.
