In Union There is Very Strong

The zombie apocalypse came and went. It wasn't a big deal. It turns out that zombies want approximately the same things that everyone else wants – three squares a day, an (un)living wage, and work that provides some measure of dignity. True, society had to adapt to the sudden influx of zombie labor, particularly the rendering factories, but all this happened without much disruption… until the Strike.

Zombies organized and took to the streets. They gathered in the public square, demanding better working conditions (e.g. regular brain breaks). There weren't enough of them to fill the square, so to make the evening news without embarrassing themselves, the zombies dug up some corpses and propped them up shoulder to shoulder with the strikers. True they were dead people, not undead, but as long as they didn't have a pulse that was OK. But this crossed the line, so far as the police were concerned. Citing a law prohibiting the assembly of smelly, decaying corpses, the police de-peopled the square, leaving only smelly but sparse zombies.

But the zombies were not ones to lie down and die in the face of adversity. They brought in more corpses, this time wrapped in thick new animal hides to keep in the smell, and in solidarity, they wore hides themselves. Thus emboldened, they chanted to the now helpless police "The fetid – new hided – will never be de-peopled! The fetid – new hided – will never be de-peopled!"
