

The Golden Egg

Henrietta was the most valuable chicken on Earth. After years of failure, biotech company Ovaris had succeeded in developing a chicken – Henrietta – that laid medicinal eggs containing a compound that could cure the ten most common forms of cancer. They sold her med eggs (as they called them) for $100,000 each, and still they had customers waiting in line. Ovaris stock soared.

But Henrietta was unhappy. “They’re raking in the cash,” she thought. “What am I getting out of it? Chicken feed!” She decided to strike. After three weeks of no med production, Ovaris stock had tanked and they were desperate. They called in a chicken psychologist to see what he could do with Henrietta. He pointed out to her that her depression was misplaced. She was actually in a very strong position. Only she knew when the eggs would come out -- the ultimate inside information, if she chose to use it. Henrietta said she’d think about it.

The next day, the psychologist returned and found Henrietta sitting on a fresh egg. Satisfied, he handed her a phone to call her stock broker and said, “Great! You’ve laid your med, now buy in it!”

