Tricks of the Trade

Before his career as a rock superstar, Mick Jagger got a job working in the kitchen of someone who had cooked in her day but was getting a bit old for all that. It was there he met Keith Richards. They would spend hours canning fruits in small glass jars, then late afternoon they brought them outside to the porch to sell to passers by. An older lady stopped to examine the jars. “They do all look so delicious. Which on ‘em d’ye fancy best, then?” Jagger responded that he just worked in the kitchen. He didn’t eat the stuff himself. The lady was taken aback. “Well, save us. I’m off then.” And she left.

Jagger turned to Richards. “I don’t get it. I thought she was going to buy something.” Richards responded. “Watch this.” Another lady stopped and asked Richards which he fancied. He said "I loves the whole lot on 'em, but I fancies the marmelet best." The lady bought the marmalade and also a jar of canned apricots. After she left, Richards smirked in triumph: “You get? -- always want what you canned!”
