Professional Mole

Jones (not his real name) was on his first big case as an FBI agent. He had been tasked with infiltrating a criminal syndicate and obstructing its operation. He gradually gained the confidence of Kevin, the head of the syndicate, by posing as an accountant. In that position, Jones learned of some of the syndicate's criminal dealings but, without a more detailed knowledge, found it difficult to hinder its flow of money. He sat down with his FBI supervisor and complained that there were others around Kevin, like his friend Kyle, who had gained Kevin's trust. They played games with each other and spoke in what seemed like a private language, one he could not understand. How could he break into this inner circle of Kevin's chums? The supervisor told Jones that his stiff professional persona was not working -- unless he be chum as a Kyle, he will not hinder the income of Kevin.